Adolescent Health in Central and Eastern Europe

For more than a decade, IJPH has been dedicated to promoting public-health knowledge from Central and Eastern European countries, making it available to the scientific community, and encouraging the transfer between East and West of knowledge and experience in survey, surveillance and health promotion research. IJPH thus invites authors to submit original articles or systematic reviews that address adolescent health in Central and Eastern Europe.

The internet and new technologies play an integral role in the lives of today’s adolescents. But their presence in the online world, which seems to be their natural environment, may not fully explain generational changes in sleeping habits, eating habits, substance use, overweight, fitness, violent behaviour, leisure time activities, and peer interactions. Adolescents today also face recession, global ecological and humanitarian crises and migration, the increasing polarization of society and the fear of terrorism.

Adolescents from the Central and Eastern European region - in addition - are confronting depopulation due to the collapse of fertility rates, economic migration, and witness or may participate in the exodus of young people. Consequently, the young generation is shrinking as the population ages. Young people see the resources of the whole region depleting as it continues its decline. The resulting changes in family structure, the precarious work conditions of their parents, or poverty may create adverse conditions for children. We want to know how the adolescent population in Central and Eastern Europe is affected by these conditions, and what interventions might help them cope better.

All of IJPH’s Author Guidelines and double-blind, peer-review rules apply (please see IJPH website).

For submission, please use the link on the IJPH website. In the comment for the editor please mention that your article is for this call. If you have questions, please contact the IJPH editorial office (ijph@swisstph.ch).

We look forward to your manuscript!
